Ticket prices for the sold-out NFC championship game between the Arizona Cardinals and Philadelphia Eagles are starting to level out and could drop as it gets closer to Sunday's kickoff at the University of Phoenix Stadium in Glendale.

Demand is high for the game, which sold out last Sunday in six minutes.

Face-value prices run from $120 per ticket on the upper level to $490 for club-level seats. List prices are way above face value on online classified and ticket brokerage sites.

Some of those Web sites add fees of as much as 22 percent to ticket prices, thus furthering the cost to buyers, according to one ticket broker who asked not to be identified.

Team One Tickets (teamonetickets.com) shows Cardinals-Eagles tickets for $275 to $300 each on the upper level and $400 to $900 each for seats in the lower bowl and club level.

The Ticket Network (ticketnetwork.com) is offering tickets for as little as $260 per seat on the upper level and between $350 and $800 per seat on the lower level.

Another ticket brokerage site, Stubhub.com, has upper-level seats for about $250 each and premium club and lower-level seats for as much as $1,800 each.

The best prices for Cards-Eagles tickets showing Friday on Craig's List were $225 per seat.

Prices tend to drop as kickoff nears and holders look to unload their unsold tickets.
